

Tregenza Roach

WHAT TO TELL A CHILD ABOUT THE SURRENDER

On the day
I forced you
from my womb,
precious daughter
I saw his face
your father,
and so believed
the loud chorus
of old women who proclaimed
that with his features
you were born
for good fortune.

And in this way
I lived your life,
taking for granted
this blessing
which was yours,
while I gave to the others
of my body
all I could spare to mitigate the suffering which seemed their part and parcel
to carry, to bear.

So it was not the perfect choice
to leave you
behind me, at the mercy
of the years,
while I played out
the conspiracy
with raging water
which in truth
was no culprit,
innocent, too,
just as the rain.

And it has been my single prayer
that you forgive
any trespass
now that you know what it requires
the title mother,
with no life
to call your own
neither space
nor solitude,
just so much
the weight of hungry tears
which follow
the troth.

For what to tell a child
about surrender
so as to make her neither humble
nor weak.
What to say
in those times
when a soul
grows tired
of blackness
and the burden
it conveys,
when your dreams

are not safe
in the land
that did birth you
and night wind sounds the call that you must go.

I have made
my own peace
with the water for each time that I cursed it
to its core
for each wave
I disdained
which gave support
to that vessel
so it could dash forth and carry me from the only world I knew.

I kept you
as I washed away
and though my eyes
grew old and weary,
until no single thing
no thing remained to interrupt the sky.
Then to gaze
instead before me
so to discover
a world anew,
prepared to pay
the price of dreaming
in this raw life
so long as breath sustains.

And know that this old heart
did never once forsake you
although beloved you might recall best
the angry welts

which I crafted.
onto your back
that childhood day
when in play
you set fire
to a canfield
before the harvest,
and I poor woman
was bereft
at the thought of owing them
all of our lives
for such damage.

It pleases me
that you are woman
with a flock
to call your own
that in your eyes
you see me still,
but not martyr
not the sainted,
just as warrior
riding high
atop these lands until we are called into the fire.

December 27, 2006